

When it comes to stopping surprise medical bills, look to local market rates for a fair solution.

As Congress debates the best way to end surprise medical bills, it's worth remembering what's causing them: a small group of doctors, often owned by private equity firms, who purposely remain out of network so they can charge patients exorbitant prices.

To stop this market distortion, momentum is building in Congress for simple, fair and market-based benchmark rates.

The federal government shouldn't unilaterally set rates. Instead, let's rely on the private sector in local markets to determine a fair price for medical services, a price which the vast majority of providers have already negotiated.

CBO estimates this solution would save hardworking taxpayers $25 billion over the next 10 years.

When you hear the same providers who send surprise bills now calling for solutions like arbitration to end it, ask yourself: Why? Is it to protect patients and taxpayers, or to protect their profits?
